The Sardine collection by Bordallo Pinheiro, the ceramics Factory of Caldas da Rainha, founded in 1884 by Raphael Bordallo Pinheiro is a reflection of how the sardine has become an icon of the city.

Every year Portuguese and foreign guest artists send illustrations, and the winners will be featured in the yearly collection.

Azulejos first came to Portugal in the 15th Century, when parts of the Iberian Peninsula were still under Moorish rule. The word is Arabic in origin and comes from az-zulayj, which roughly translates as “polished stone”.

Although these elaborately-painted Portuguese tiles, fell out of favour in the early 20th Century, Lisbon today is embracing the art in its murals, museums and metro stations by the likes of famous Portuguese artists such as Jorge Barradas, Querubim Lapa, Eduardo Nery and Maria Keil leading the way with their signature styles.

CERAMIC AZULEJOS TILE TABLE MAT

Derived from the Arabic word “Zellige”, meaning “polished stone”, the word “Azulejo” shows the unmistakable Arabic origins of Portuguese Tiles; interlocking curvilinear, geometric or florar motifs that imitate the original Roman mosaics are at the base of the “Azulejo” art. These ceramic table mats are inspired by the old azulejo tiles patterns on the façades of Portuguese buildings in Belém. Each tile is hand-painted according to the traditional techniques and processes of the century XVIII.

Filigree, the ancient art of ornamental openwork wrought of fine gold or silver wire, is flourishing in Portugal today as it has for generations.

The delicate technique which requires great patience and skill, dates back to the third millennium B.C., and has been handed down from generation to generation.

In Viana do Castelo in the North of Portugal, a bride will wear an astonishing pair of sterling silver Queen Earrings, but also two or more gold necklaces around her neck, with at least one heart-shaped pendant.

Sharon Stone too has been spotted wearing breathtaking filigree pendants.
